Level 12 Response Transcript

So if you ask me, to give you an advice about your, uh, position, about the position that you get at the, uh, software development company. I would sell, uh, say first of all, when you get to the company, start, uh, scanning for, uh, scanning the environment. Start seeing people around you. Uh, start seeing what are people, what they're doing, and, uh, you can also, uh, search some resources online about the company itself—about its goals; about, uh, about your position and what you are going to do, uh, with the company; what are the company's goals are; so that you can achieve, uh, you can do your best at the company.

Uh, always talk to the, uh, other coworkers about your position; about the stuff that they are doing; about your relationships with them. Uh, be aware of the position of the uh, be aware of your relationship with your managers, with your coworkers, and sometimes it can be really helpful for you.

Since I'm a software engineer and I have some sort of, uh, work experience, I can tell you that coworkers sometimes can be your best friends—I mean, like, your work friends of course. They can help you through stuff; you can help them through stuff. Uh, with, uh, working together, you can we-when you have the opportunity to build a peaceful environment at your workplace, it's gonna help you achieve higher levels easily. And you can develop your talents and, uh, do your best at your job.
